ABSTRACT

This paper discusses ways in which maternal attitudes may serve as mediating variables linking social class characteristics of the family to the socialization of children. Reference is made to the Family Problem Scale (Ernhart and Loevinger) which provides a psychological characterization of social class levels on five dimensions or subscales: authoritarian family ideology, approval of conventional social role for women, denial of hostility, concern for moralistic control, basic distrust vs. trust. Ten other subscales were created by imposing a priori constructs on items of the Family Problem Scale. These "a priori scales" are: old vs. new child rearing ideologies, mother's view of sex role, toilet training attitude, mother's house cleaning attitude, resentment, open vs. enclosed family, affirmation vs. denial of aggression, autonomy vs. dependence, subscales of autonomy and sex role attitudes, attitudes towards pregnancy. In this report, preliminary ideas are given as to how the a priori scales might be related to social class levels or within them to variables like racial groupings and different-sized families. The a priori scales are included in an appendix. (JH)

A component of the project: Research in the Methodology of Longitudinal and Cross-Sectional Studies has been to develop and test a structural equation model for the parental production function in education. This report is a progress report for that component.

The basic strategy in developing such a parental production function is to establish the mediating variables which link the social class characteristics of the family to the child's socialization. One of the links in this chain is the attitude configuration of the mother. This report summarizes some of the work to date which formed a part of the attempt at conceptualizing the ways in which these influences are mediated. Empirical data analyses based on these conceptualizations have been and are being performed and will be described in later reports.

Analysis of the Family Problem Scale

(Ernhart & Loevinger, 1969)

One of the main goals of the analysis of the St. Louis Baby Data is not only the clustering of social strata with respect to the traditional triad of income, occupation, and education, but also to consider the variables of race, family size, housing condition, and psychological factors such as those measured in Ernhart and Loevinger's Family Problem Scale (1969). We intend to characterize social class levels psychologically^{by} the five original clusters of the Family Problem Scale and also by other scales constructed from that same instrument by us. The subscales are as follows:

(1) Ernhart & Loevinger

Authoritarian Family Ideology

Approval of Conventional Social Role for Women

Denial of Hostility

Concern for Moralistic Control

Basic Distrust vs. Trust

(2) Harnischfeger & Wiley

Old vs. New Child Rearing Ideologies

Mother's View of Sex Role (Special Longitudinal Scale)

Toilet Training Attitude

Mother's House Cleaning Attitude

Resentfulness

Open vs. Enclosed Family

Affirmation vs. Denial of Aggression

Autonomy vs. Dependence

Subscales of Both Autonomy and Sex Role Attitudes

Attitudes Towards Pregnancy

The scale construction of Ernhart & Loevinger differs from ours in that the former was based on inter-item correlation as/^aclustering criterion (factor analysis) and therefore was empirically based, while the new scales are a priori constructs imposed on the items of the Family Problem Scale. Our target of relevance is inter-social class discrimination of psychological variables we consider important in child rearing practices. We will analyze the behavior of these a priori scales and assess their cohesiveness.

The data from the St. Louis Baby Study also allow a partial analysis of change, because the Authoritarian Family Ideology subscale (AFI) was given at two points.

Birth of Child	3 years	3 1/2 years
AFI ₆₅	FPS, mainly to Whites of Cohert I only	FPS, mainly to Blacks of Cohert II only. AFI ₆₈ to Whites of Cohert II

All mothers were given the 1965 version of the Authoritarian Family Ideology subscale (AFI₆₅)¹⁾ at the birth of the criterion child. Three years later the mothers of Cohert I - the total sample had been split into Cohert I and II - answered the whole Family Problem Scale. Unfortunately, many black mothers did not answer to questionnaire so that this measurement is mainly based on whites. The mothers of Cohert II answered the Family Problem Scale²⁾ when the criterion child was 3 1/2 years old. At this time point the emphasis was on black mothers and only the Authoritarian Family Ideology (AFI₆₈) Scale/was given to whites. These conditions imply that the measurement of change cannot be based on the whole Sample and is also limited to the items of the Authoritarian Family Ideology Scale.

Assumed Discriminative Power of Subscales

Following are some preliminary ideas of how the subscales might be related to social class level or within them to such variables as racial groupings and families of different sizes.

1. Authoritarian Family Ideology: We conjecture that mothers scoring high on this scale have a conservative, lower middle-class background, and may be often come from small towns or rural areas. These mothers should be upwardly mobile in their goals for children. Their ideal is the middle-class family life of about thirty years ago. High

1) Version AFI₆₅ has 8 items that were eliminated in the AFI₆₈.

2) The FPS includes the AFI₆₈ only.

scorers on this scale are in favor of traditional sex-role education; they enforce a strict toilet training, cleanliness and orderliness, and live on strict rules and schedules; they react strongly to being criticized by their children and are untouched by new insights into child development. We believe that mothers with an Authoritarian Family Ideology will be found equally often in the black and white lower-middle class groups.

2. Approval of Conventional Social Role for Women: High scorers will be found mainly in the middle class groups. This scale should be positively related to that described in 1). Surely sex-role socialization is in accordance with the socializer's view of women. High scorers approve of the housewife's role and of a strong dependency status. As a consequence of their approval of dependence they will not let their children practice autonomous behavior and develop responsibility. Surely, this attitude will not be found in lower class black families, because they cannot afford it. In these families, many of which are without father, mothers experience that men do not take over so much responsibility. In these families the children have to assume responsibility too.
3. Denial of Hostility: It seems to us that mothers scoring high on this scale will not be found in lower classes but to a considerable extent in the upper half of the social stratum. The ideology of having to find everybody and everything nice is widely spread in the U.S. Problems are negated, mothers feel that they should be desperately happy all the time and compulsive/enjoy every minute of their life. This kind of attitude is an outcome of mis-education and socialization which lower class people "miss".

4. Concern for Moralistic Control: Presumably, this scale is also highly correlated with the Authoritarian Family Ideology Scale and high values may define the same group of people. Orderliness, a scheduled life, and conservative opinions about sex are characteristic of high values on both scales. Certain sex denying religious groups could be identified with this scale. Currently, we do not have information on mother's religious affiliation and we will, therefore, be limited to social class comparisons in confirming our hypotheses.
5. Basic Distrust vs. Trust: This scale is probably unrelated to social class level. Many of the items are concerned with self-confidence, self-esteem, and relations with other people. Some, however, seem not to fit in this picture and are not easily subsumed under the scale name. We expect that this scale is related to more basic personality traits. Trustful, self-confident persons are presumably also the more successful ones, the confirmation of which is hindered by the problem of defining successful, especially for housewives. Mother's education is a variable which reflects social class origins and is likely unrelated to trust or distrust. An analysis with mother's occupation, however, which compares the housewife to mothers employed outside the house should produce more substantial differences. We would assume that working mothers are more trusting and that mothers in higher/^{level} occupations have even more trust and self-confidence.

6. Old vs. New Child-Rearing Ideology: Although many of the items of this scale stem from the AFI, a considerable number are different. This scale is restricted to items concerning child-rearing practices while the AFI also has more general items. We believe that mothers with high levels of education, that is, of high social class level will be in favor of new child-rearing practices -- those which are influenced by recent developments in child psychology and by psychoanalysis. This assumption is based on the observation that these mothers are more conscious about education and actively acquire information improving their children's socialization. At the other extreme, we assume, on the basis of other studies that lower-class mothers/^{also} behave more according to new child-rearing practices, because they are more permissive than lower middle-class mothers.
7. Toilet Training: This is a subscale of (6). The assumption is that rigid toilet training is in direction of older child-rearing practices.

8. Mother's House Cleaning Attitude: Focus on cleanliness is less expected in the lower class group. Although this scale is probably related to (1) we do not believe that it has enough discriminative power to differentiate social class/^{es}clearly.
9. Mother's View of Sex-Role: Again, a conservative traditional attitude is predicted for middle class -- especially lower middle-class -- mothers. Mothers from small towns or rural backgrounds should be even more extreme in their conservative views.
10. Resentfulness: This scale measures the degree of pessimism toward the world and it is expected that people scoring high on this scale will score low on Trust (5). As with the latter we assume no relation to social class but expect that the scale reflects more basic personality traits such as self-esteem and self-confidence. We will perform some of the same analyses with this scale as with (5).
11. Autonomy vs. Dependence: Mothers who prefer dependence are probably less frequently employed and less trustful. Presumably they tend to follow the ideology of "a woman's place is in the home" and they keep their children dependent on themselves and tied to the house. This type of mother seems to ^{occur} more frequently in middle and upper middle class families and especially in small families.

Mothers of large families usually cannot avoid becoming more independent and autonomous and find it difficult to keep their children from developing independence. The impossibility of rigid control and close attachment of children in large families to their mother increases their autonomy even with basically dependence-fostering mothers.

12. Enclosed vs. Open Family: Enclosed families are those which prefer to be by themselves and have few guests and friends. We assume that this type of family is small and is found mostly in the middle and lower-middle classes. In large families it is more likely that some members bring friends home and a few addition/^{al}persons more or less do not really increase the amount of effort any more. With respect to child-rearing, we expect this to/^{be}a rather important variable. We believe that children from open families are more likely to develop good relationships to others and to make more subtle evaluation/^sof others.
13. Affirmation vs. Denial of Aggression: Mothers who permanently suppress their aggression surely exert a lot of it towards their children. They also force their children to deny aggression which ultimately brings about the same behavior. A permanently tense home atmosphere is one result. This behavior is closely related to Denial of Hostility (3) and will be analyzed similarly.

14. Subscales of Both Autonomy and Sex Role Attitudes: We formed four subscales which focus on both autonomy or dependence and traditional or more contemporary sex role attitudes. The subscales cover the areas of women working outside the home, of women's general activities outside the home, of women's social roles, and more general basic issues of sex role differentiation. We expect the differentiative power of these scales to be in the direction indicated for the scales "Autonomy vs. Dependence" and "Mother's View of Sex Role".
15. Attitudes Towards Pregnancy: We assume that this short scale might differentiate mothers with few children from those with many. Mothers with higher social class backgrounds and many children, we believe to have especially positive attitudes towards pregnancy.

Item-No.

B. The hardest part about raising children is not being able to get out. 25

A. It's easier for a woman to stay home with children than go to work every day.

B. Most women want the kind of husband who will let them have a job outside the home. 58

A. Most women want the kind of husband who won't let them have a job outside the house.

B. Some women with small children will be better mothers if they have outside jobs than if they don't. 85

A. If a woman has small children, she shouldn't work outside her home. 16

General

B. A woman resents her husband taking over all the big decisions. 35

A. A woman has more respect for a man who takes over the decisions.

B. It's better to have some people think you are a bit peculiar than to be just like everyone else. 104

A. It's better to be one of the crowd than to be thought a bit peculiar.

Autonomy vs. Dependence continued

Item-No.

A. Parents of small children should try to get a baby-sitter and go out together at least once a week.

108

B. When children are small, it is best not to leave them with baby-sitters.
